going to read that anyway.*

MEOW

Finding your next favourite book shouldn't feel like a chore.
PlotTwist turns library browsing into a fun, mood-based experience ✨ helping you discover stories you'll love, borrow with confidence, and keep track of returns with gentle, friendly reminders 🌻.

Assumptions About the Users

As someone who's spent way too many afternoons wandering around libraries (and occasionally questioning my life choices in the aisles), I'm assuming our users are:

Casual Readers

People who want to read more but freeze the second they walk into a library. They're overwhelmed by choice, don't know what they're in the mood for, and just quietly pray for a sign from the universe... or a helpful librarian.

Mood-Based Browsers

Readers who pick books based on vibes: "I want something heartwarming but not cheesy, fast but not stressful, mysterious but not too murder-y."

They need mood-first tools, not Dewey Decimal flashbacks.

Task - driven Borrowers

People who come to the library with one mission:

Get in → Get the book → Get out.

They want fast search, clear categories, and absolutely zero plot twists when it comes to picking up the right book.

Forgetful Humans (aka All of us)

People who borrow with pure intentions... and then forget everything about the return date until someone texts,

"Hey, didn't you issue a book like, last month?"

So yes, the users are basically people who love stories but dislike messy systems.

Pain Points

These come from both user logic and my own emotional scars from library hunts

“I walk in wanting a book... and walk out with confusion.”

overwhelmed.

“I don’t have an hour to wander aisles hoping the book appears magically.”

abandoned intent

“I type normal things into search, and it gives me academic papers.”

emotional queries???

“I walk in wanting a book... and walk out with confusion.”

emotional queries???

curation??

“Half the books aren’t even in the section the system says they’re in.”

zero trust

“I want suggestions, not a spreadsheet of books.”

guilt spiral

“I always forget the return date... until it’s TOO LATE.”

What Success Looks Like for the Library

Success = A library experience so intuitive that people actually want to come back.

⌚ Faster Discovery

Goal: Users find a book they want within 3 minutes

Why it matters: Lower cognitive load → higher borrowing rate

⌚ Fewer Overdue Books

Goal: Reduce overdue returns by 50% through reminders

Outcome: Less library chaos, happier readers

⚙️ Higher Borrow Completion

Goal: More users move from browsing → borrowing\

Metric: atleast+25% increase in daily borrows

🔍 Reliable Search

Goal: Increase successful searches by 40%

Outcome: Users trust the system again

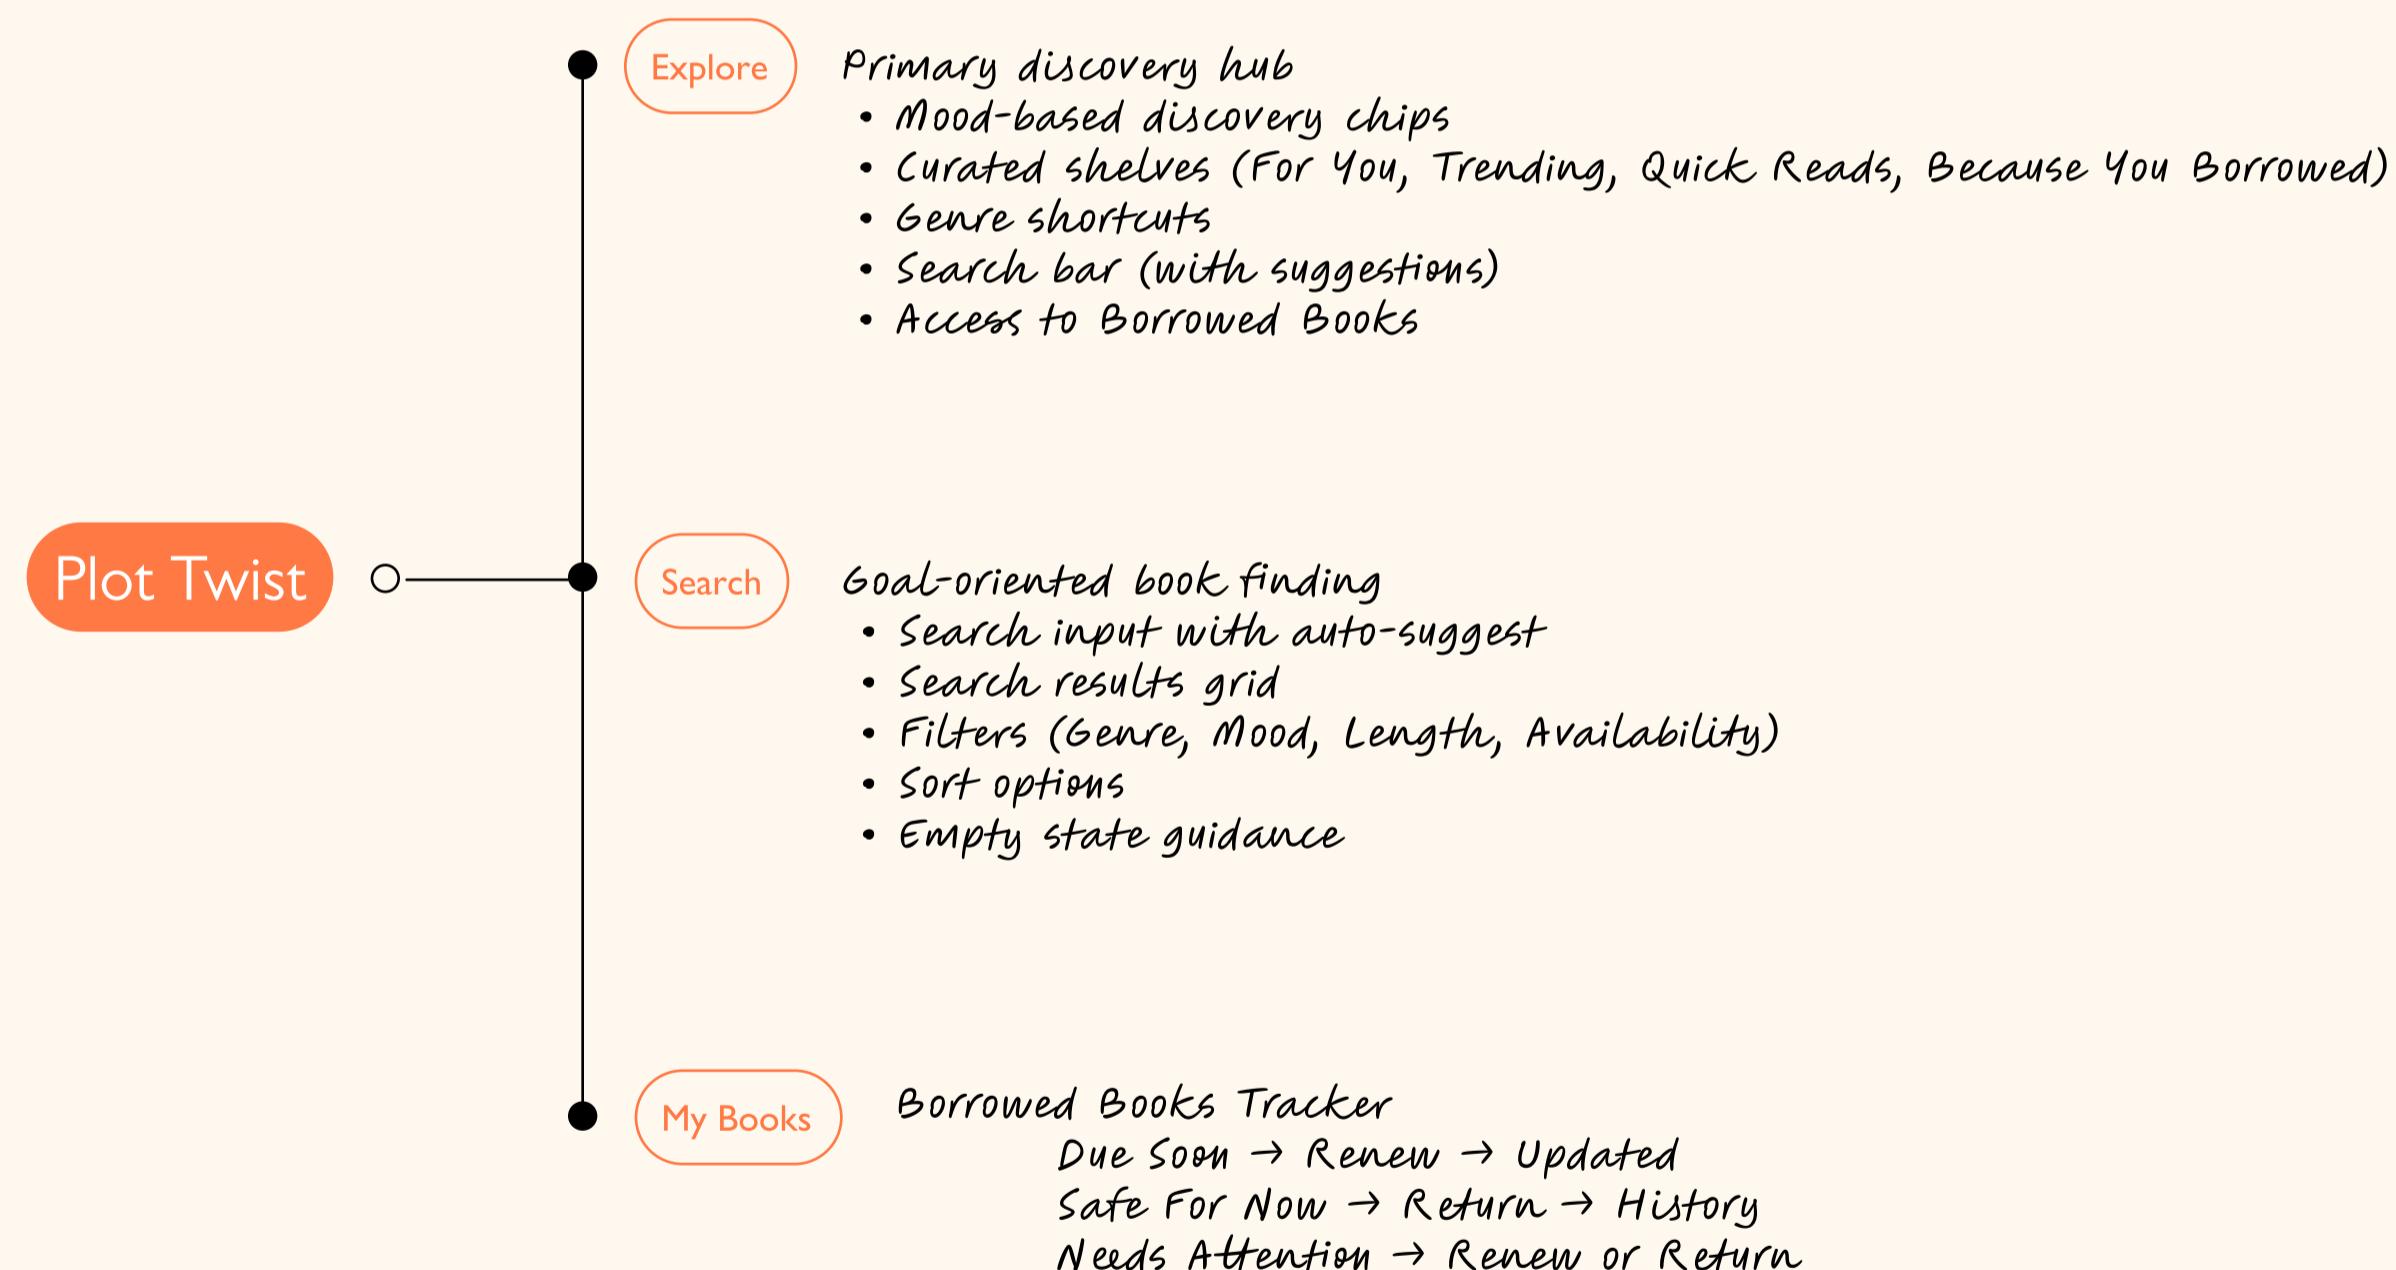

Emotional Wins

Users feel guided, not lost . Reading feels fun again & People come back more often

PlotTwist – UX Rationale

Designed the way I wish libraries felt.

As a lifelong reader who's wandered too many aisles feeling overwhelmed, the home screen brings together mood chips, curated shelves, and a friendly search bar because readers start their journeys differently, and all of those ways deserve space.

I wanted choosing a book to feel intuitive, not intimidating.

That's why book cards show the things readers actually care about: mood, reading time, and availability. No mysteries, no surprises just clarity that helps you follow your vibe.

The book detail opens as a modal because real browsing is messy.

You dip in, check the blurb, close it, keep scrolling. This micro-interaction mirrors that natural rhythm and keeps the user in flow, instead of forcing a full page shift.

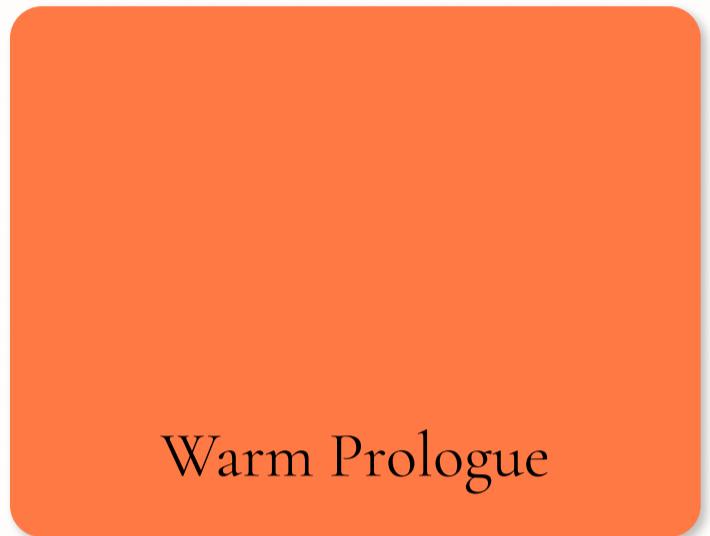

The whole interface speaks in a warm, inviting tone.

Lines like "What's your reading vibe?" and the soft visual language intentionally remove the formality that libraries often carry, I wanted this to feel like a reading companion, not a database.

"Surprise Me" exists because sometimes even I don't know what I want.

So I created a playful, low-pressure space where fate (and a little UX logic) picks a book for you. It reduces decision fatigue and adds a moment of delight a tiny plot twist of its own.
